

Open Lecture by Dr Marco Krüger

International Center for Ethics in the Sciences and Humanities,
University of Tübingen, Germany

“Resilience in International Relations: Buzzword or Political Panacea?”

Dr Marco Krüger works as a senior researcher and research group lead at the International Centre for Ethics in the Sciences and Humanities at the University of Tübingen. His expertise lies in the fields of (critical) security studies and security ethics. In his work, Marco analysed German as well as international disaster management regime and traced the emancipatory potential of resilience. He is the principal investigator of several research projects which approach resilience policies from different angles, including the consideration of societally marginalized groups, such as care-recipients and impaired people, in security politics. Furthermore, Marco is a member of the parliamentary commission “Resilient Society” of the parliament of the Federal State of Baden-Württemberg.
